

northern latitudes

The luminous glow of dancing lights in the northern latitude's sky, known as the Aurora Borealis or Northern Lights, are a sight many travel to see. The light's colors and movements burst onto the skies and turn a dark night into a magical light show.

Throughout history the lights have been a source for art, mythology and legends from all different cultures. In medieval times the aurora were seen as an omen of war or famine. The Maori of New Zealand shared a belief with many northern people of Europe and North America, that the lights were reflections from torches or campfires. The Inuit of Alaska believed that the lights were the spirits of the animals they hunted. Other aboriginal peoples believed that the lights were the spirits of their people.

The Northern Lights can be seen in the northern or southern hemispheres, near the magnetic poles. It is believed the northern and southern auroras are mirror-like images, occurring at the same time. The Northern Lights have been seen as far south as New Orleans, however they are best seen in northern Canada, Alaska, Greenland, Iceland, Norway and Siberia.
